uniting pilgrimage Von Roman Nies I compare this book to a book I read about a pilgrimage to a catholic place of worship. Then also I remind myself to other sites, to which curiosity rather than religious cause brought me where I witnessed always the same fervour to enlighten oneself in the sense of gaining religious merits. Such sites were Kerbela in Iraq, Adams Peak in Sri Lanka, of course Rome, Haridwar in India. The motives of the people are the same and certainly comparable. For non-believers it is sure that they serve their own self more than their God. Only Hindus admit this. As for Makkha, where Christians cannot visit, there is sth special, because pilgrimage to the Kaaba originally stood in sharp contrast to Islam. It should not be forgotten that it was a place of worship already before Muhammad. The arabs were poletheists and worshipped among other Gods the moon God, and the Kaaba was the place for it. But Muhammad thought political and took the place over for his goals. That was clever. Did Allah tell him to do so or did he want to win followers among those for who the Kaaba was an ancient Arab pilgrimage site? Some claim that there is no explanation why God could find pleasure in such an exercise. Did the Prophet rather want to install a center for Arab identity? If so he succeeded. He was a thinker ahead who knew well what he had to do to form one nation. The decision at that time was surprising and so inconsistent with Islamic principles that many Moslems were upset. The Kaaba was the place of worship for the Polytheists, they thought. How could it be the place of worship for God? On the other side if Mekkha should lose its prosperity, there might be a risk of wide spread apostacy. That risk would be averted by making pilgrimage to Mekkha incumbent on Moslems. They would come and pay for it. Religion always needs money to establish itself in the world. Pilgrims of today have not such contemplations. They have the obligation to travel once in their lifetime to Mekkha. A blessing for those who are born there! Muslims of all nations come together for the same purpose. This serves the interest of Islam.
