I did not see addressed the WHY ARE KIDS SCORING LOW in schools of low socioeconomic students. How do you account for this besides blaming teachers for using "regrograde and ineffective methods of teaching in urban and rural areas?" I thought that was very weak. Also, what you suggest looks doable but why don't schools from high socioeconomic areas have the same testing problems as those you sight in your book? WHY don't these kids learn? Why don't we look for some of these answers? It feels punitive for teachers of schools that score poorly. It's not the kids. It's the lack of life experiences that hold them back. This is totally test driven. I doubt that these kids who will have better test scores from Result will be better educated. It's just a political move, at best.

Kurzbeschreibung Mike Schmoker describes how teachers and administrators can surpass the community's expectations and facilitate great improvements in student learning by setting goals, working collaboratively, and keeping track of student achievement data from many sources. Through hundreds of up to date examples from real schools and districts, Schmoker shows how to achieve and celebrate both short and long term success.
